

FOSS COMM /26

What is FOSSCOMM?

The annual summit for Greece's free and open-source communities. Completely independent, volunteer-run and free to attend.

It is two days of talks, hands-on workshops and community booths, free and open to anyone who wants to take part. The programme is built by contributors and communities, united by the belief that digital equality and open access to knowledge are fundamental rights.

Running every year since 2008, it has travelled the length of this country, hosted by a different university and local community in turn and grown into one of the largest open-technology audiences in Greece.

Each year it brings the founders, maintainers and academics behind internationally recognised projects together with the students, developers and public-sector technologists who actually build and adopt open software.

WHY SPONSOR US?

Developers who choose and maintain open-source software are the most valuable audience in technology and the hardest one to reach. Their work sits inside almost everything and currently appears in 98% of all commercial codebases. Black Duck

To this audience, what you choose to fund says more than anything you could advertise. This community trusts what its own people vouch for. Back the work they value, and the message lands on its own.

/ 01

Hire FOSS talent

Recruiting engineers is one of tech's most expensive problems, and open-source talent is the scarcest of all. A single recruiter placement can cost more than your entire sponsorship. Here, you meet that talent in person, over two days.

- + 93% of employers struggle to find enough open-source talent. Linux Foundation.
- + 63% of companies already contribute to open source just to recruit from it. Linux Foundation
- + Meet students, graduates and contributors who already know your stack.

/ 02

Community trust

These aren't just passive attendees, they're the engineers and team leads who choose what their organisations adopt and they're rarely all in one place. Two days at this event is direct access to them, as a name they associate with supporting the work they value.

- + ~75% of developers have significant or complete influence over what their organisation buy. IDC
- + 62% have a direct say in their company's technology purchases. Stack Overflow
- + Seen as a trusted peer and a contributor to open source, rather than an advertiser interrupting it.

/ 03

Targeted exposure

Your logo across the site, signage, broadcast, recordings and the archive that stays online for as long as the internet exists. Your name is in places this audience actually looks, that most advertising never touches.

- + 72% of developers use an ad blocker regularly, versus 11% of internet users. Stack Overflow
- + 62% have stopped visiting a site because of its advertising. Stack Overflow
- + 48% of developers will research a product without ever clicking an ad. Stack Overflow
- + Your name in a context this audience chooses to be in. Seen on their terms, in a setting where they're actually paying attention.

Share your work

These are open-source engineers who actually want to dig into what you're building. Back the event and you're among people who'll dig into the substance and tell you what holds up and what doesn't. It's a community that notices who's genuinely invested in open source, whether you're sharing it across a table or from the stage.

- + Developers adopt or reject technology on substance like security, pricing and quality, not marketing. Stack Overflow
- + Get technical feedback straight from practitioners who'd actually use what you build.
- + Companies and organizations that actively support the open-source ecosystem are the ones we most want to feature.
